

Lip Reading Surveillance Cameras To Stop Terror

Friday, 27 April 2007

Lip Reading Surveillance Cameras To Stop Terror

"Read my lips ..." used to be a figurative saying. Now the British government is considering taking it literally by adding lip reading technology to some of the four million or so surveillance cameras in order identify terrorists and criminals by watching what everyone says.

Electronic Design is reporting that the Home Office is interested in a project being pursued by a senior lecturer in computer vision at the University of East Anglia in Norwich, England.¹

Read more ...